why, above all things, had he left no word?

Not for a moment did Oliver suspect the man of dishonesty. He trusted Henry as implicitly as he would have trusted himself. Nevertheless he felt a shiver of apprehensionJso many strange things had happened in the past few hours. Henry's disappearance was only one more problem to confuse his mind.

The youth in the studio was waiting, however. He must get the package quickly. If possible, he would parley with him before delivering it, but just now, Henry or no Henry, the immediate necessity was to take the package from its hiding place.

He knelt before the safe and commenced to turn the lock.

Around and around he turned it until he thought he had the combination right. There was a sound in the doorway and he turned quickly. The boy with the revolver stood quietly watching him.

"Is that where you kept it?" said the girl's messenger curiously.

"Yes," said Oliver with a shade of
